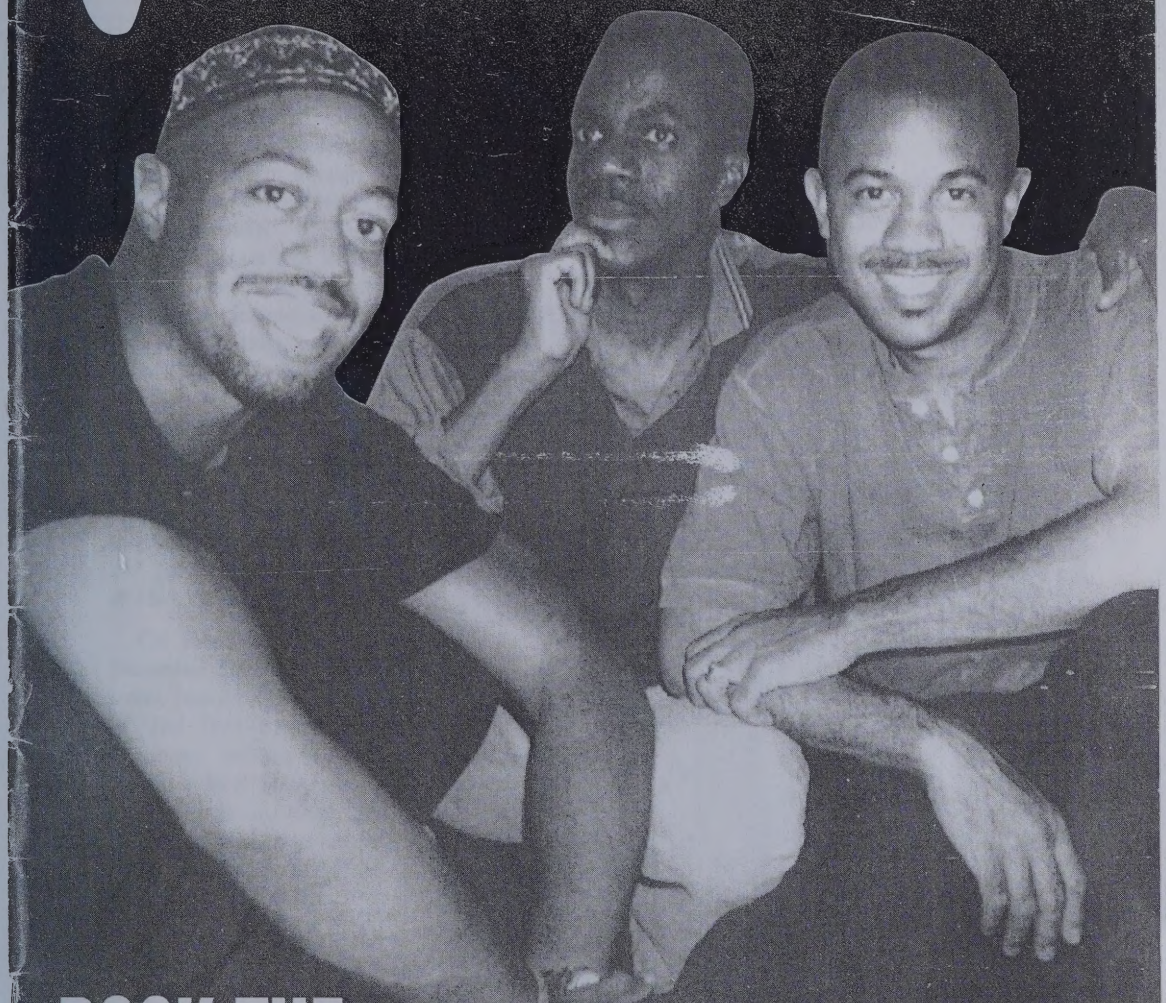
Venus™

October/November 1996



ROCK THE VOTE!

Why you need to RUN to the polls!

SECOND SUNDAY

Discussing Black Gay Men

SECOND SUNDAY

by Craig Washington

Second Sunday's mission statement defines the group as "a support organization created to assist the collective growth of gay, bisexual and transgendered men of African descent through educational, social, spiritual and cultural activities." They discuss scheduled topics that address a broad range of issues such as relationship maintenance, masculinity/femininity, ageism and others. As the name implies, the brothers congregate every second Sunday of each month. The regular meeting place was secured through an arrangement with Pastor S.F. Mahee of Unity Fellowship, Atlanta's only openly gay place of worship for the BG & L community.

On the second Sunday in November the group will host writer, James Earl Hardy, author of "2nd Time Around". The December meeting will host Atlanta's local black gay theatre/readers group, Adodi Muse. All gay men of color are welcome. For directions and other information call 404-325-7321.

Meetings open with announcements highlighting group activities and community events. Discussion is led by a predesignated facilitator who encourages participation through

CONTINUED ON PAGE 11

"Solely by word of mouth, the group's popularity widened and its ranks expanded. Meeting formats became more varied, including panels, guest speakers, small group breakouts."

SECOND SUNDAY,
CONTINUED FROM PAGE 9

exploration of the topic. Attendants are urged to use "I" statements and to speak from personal experience. Because of the sensitivity of information shared (such as HIV disclosure) the group requests discretion and confidentiality. Non-judgmentalism is another golden rule usually obeyed. The meetings are often high-spirited as participants are passionate about their concerns. And of course, everyone has an opinion which makes for lively conversation. To the group's merit, the brothers agree to disagree with vehemence, not venom.

At the discussion's end, donations are solicited through a passing of the proverbial plate. Attendants then join hands and are led through a closing affirmation which varies from traditional Christian prayer to an Afrocentric appreciation of the Creator and our ancestors. Specific words of healing are offered after a particularly intense session. Afterward, the "congregation" breaks bread with potluck meals set up just outside the meeting space. Brothers then have an opportunity to relax, meet new faces and enjoy each other's energy.

It all started in November 1992 on a car ride back to Atlanta. Maurice Franklin, a well-known Atlanta activist now living in New York and a friend were returning from a Howard University homecoming weekend. During the trip, the two friends had attended a black gay men's rap session focusing on shade-consciousness within the race. On the return drive to Atlanta, they buzzed about the potential for similar organizing in their city. They hammered out the structure and logistics and Franklin rounded up other local activists like Archie Freeman, Kamau Ifoma and Bruce Wilkerson. "We had about nine people show up to that first meeting at my house," Franklin recalls. "The first topic was 'Does Your Mama Know.?' We were at different levels of comfort regarding our sexuality. We wanted a structure that supported honesty and free thought."

From its inception, Second Sunday had an informal style that promoted intimacy and spirituality. Monthly meetings were scheduled for the second Sunday, and rotated among members' homes. Potluck meals were established as a ritual. The spirits of the ancestors were invoked regularly. Word quickly spread throughout the community that something special was happening for black men - an entity created by and for brothers to provide safety for each other as same-sex attracted men. "It was time for black gay men to take care of their own," Franklin muses. "If we live in fear we cannot be strong. We wanted to foster new people to become leaders."

Solely by word of mouth, the group's popularity widened and its ranks expanded. Meeting formats became more varied, including panels, guest speakers, small group breakouts. Presentations were often very stylish. A session on black and white men relationships was held as a mock trial with legendary diva Duncan Teague as attorney for the defendant "Interracial Dating." A joint meeting with ZAMI, the black lesbian organization, was entitled "Everything You Always Wanted To Ask A Lesbian But Were Afraid You'd Get Beat Up!"

Meetings were still held in members' homes, with more than forty men cramming into living rooms, and standing and squatting on floors. Some of the old guard such as Franklin and Freeman had relocated and newer members were stepping up to the plate. A handful of them handled all the necessary tasks — mailing flyers, setting up potluck and facilitating meetings. A focus group meeting was held at Kalo's Coffeehouse to identify problems and devise solutions. Doug Jones, a writer currently residing in New York, was an active member during that period. "Second Sunday was a child then going through its terrible two's. It was a natural outgrowth of new people coming in, a lack of continuity between the new and the early members."

With over 120 members on its mailing list and an average attendance of 65 men per meeting, Second Sunday has grown tremendously. Its success may be at least partially attributed to its adherence to its original priorities and despite its expansion, there is still a level of intimacy. It still offers an environment that's safe, fun and supportive. The potluck is still a mainstay.

By-Laws were written and elections were held to usher in formal structure and accountability. The two Co-Chairmen are Ulester Douglas, a psychotherapist, and instructor with Men Stopping Violence and The Rainbow Project; and Craig Washington, an activist and African American Outreach

CONTINUED ON PAGE 13

SECOND SUNDAY,
CONTINUED FROM PAGE 11

Coordinator with AID Atlanta. Accountant Robert Simmons serves as the Treasurer and Kevin Madison, as Interim Secretary. A chain of several task committees, a steering committee and an executive committee performs the administrative duties.

With over 120 members on its mailing list and an average attendance of 65 men per meeting, Second Sunday has grown tremendously. It's success may be partially attributed to its adherence to its original priorities and despite its expansion, there is still a level of intimacy. It still offers an environment that is safe, fun and supportive. The potluck is still a mainstay. And there's no other space in town quite like it. Egypt Freeman explains, "[It's] something outside of the smoky bars and clubs where we look at each other in the dark. It's a way of meeting these people we see out and finding out who they are and what they're thinking." On a more personal note, Freeman adds, "I come to meet people and come out of my closet, not of sexuality, but my closet of personality. It makes it easier to talk to people." Co-Chairman Douglas adds , "Also, it is a place where we challenge the oppressive forces which nurture self-hate and distrust of each other. We build intimacy and a sense of community."

This year the group held several social functions to raise funds and promote more bonding outside of the meetings. The "Where The Boys Are - 1996 Picnic" was their first annual Labor Day fundraiser and drew favorable reviews from Atlantans and out-of-towners.

Second Sunday has made concerted efforts to address the AIDS epidemic in their community. They recently signed agreements with AIDS Education and Services for Minorities (AESM) and AID Atlanta's Umoja Project to host safer sex forums. An AIDS Walk team is being assembled and a panel discussion on Alternative AIDS Therapies is scheduled for November. The group also serves as a collaborator with an HIV-intervention program at Georgia State University targeting young black gay men.

As the organization undergoes growth in rank and activities, it strives to serve its main purpose - its raison d'etre. Some members have expressed concern that the focus could become lost. Hopefully, Second Sunday will continue to do what it does very well and the brothers will continue to attend. One member offered simply, "I just come here for the love, that's all."

Venus™
WORKS!

Advertise Your Business Here!

"Our black gay books fly off the shelf!"
—Shawn
Owner, Truth Bookstore

(404) 755-8711
ADD THE POWER OF VENUS TO YOUR SALES TEAM.

SECOND SUNDAY

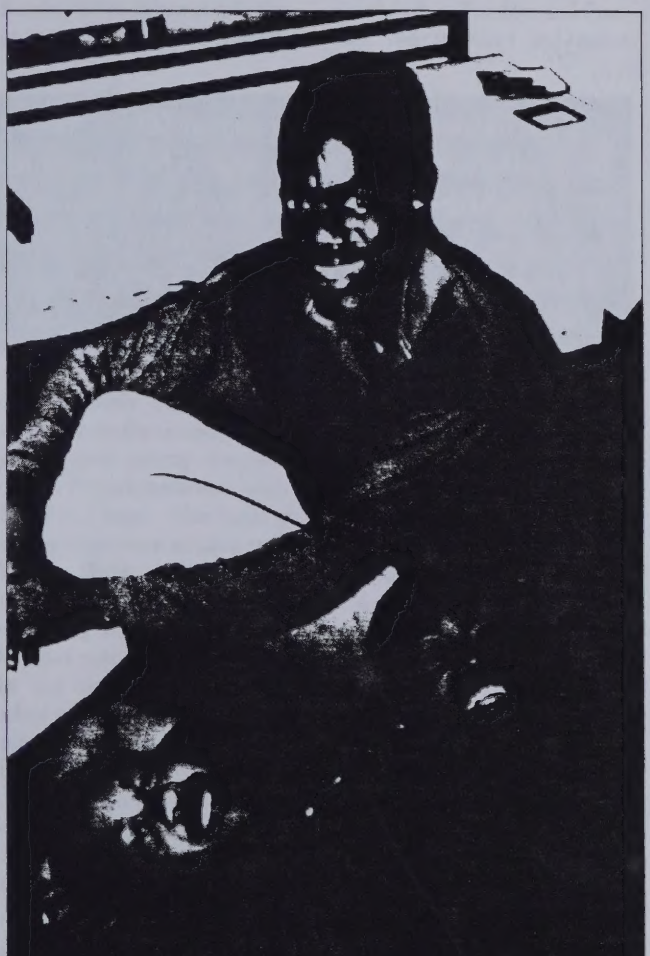
by Craig Washington

Second Sunday's mission statement defines the group as "a support organization created to assist the collective growth of gay, bisexual and transgendered men of African descent through educational, social, spiritual and cultural activities." They discuss scheduled topics that address a broad range of issues such as relationship maintenance, masculinity/femininity, ageism and others. As the name implies, the brothers congregate every second Sunday of each month. The regular meeting place was secured through an arrangement with Pastor S.F. Mahee of Unity Fellowship, Atlanta's only openly gay place of worship for the BG & L community.

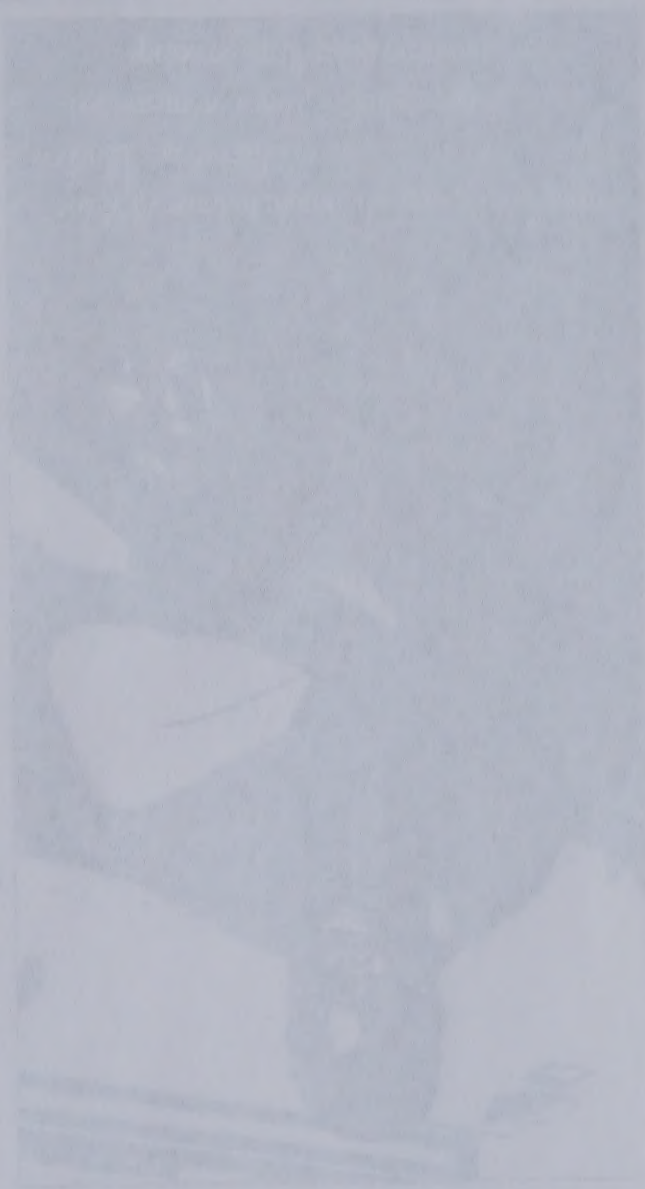
On the second Sunday in November the group will host writer, James Earl Hardy, author of "2nd Time Around". The December meeting will host Atlanta's local black gay theatre/readers group, Adodi Muse. All gay men of color are welcome. For directions and other information call 404-325-7321.

Meetings open with announcements highlighting group activities and community events. Discussion is led by a predesignated facilitator who encourages participation through

CONTINUED ON PAGE 11



"Solely by word of mouth, the group's popularity widened and its ranks expanded. Meeting formats became more varied, including panels, guest speakers, small group breakouts."



SECOND SUNDAY,
CONTINUED FROM PAGE 9

exploration of the topic. Attendants are urged to use "I" statements and to speak from personal experience. Because of the sensitivity of information shared (such as HIV disclosure) the group requests discretion and confidentiality. Non-judgmentalism is another golden rule usually obeyed. The meetings are often high-spirited as participants are passionate about their concerns. And of course, everyone has an opinion which makes for lively conversation. To the group's merit, the brothers agree to disagree with vehemence, not venom.

At the discussion's end, donations are solicited through a passing of the proverbial plate. Attendants then join hands and are led through a closing affirmation which varies from traditional Christian prayer to an Afrocentric appreciation of the Creator and our ancestors. Specific words of healing are offered after a particularly intense session. Afterward, the "congregation" breaks bread with potluck meals set up just outside the meeting space. Brothers then have an opportunity to relax, meet new faces and enjoy each other's energy.

It all started in November 1992 on a car ride back to Atlanta. Maurice Franklin, a well-known Atlanta activist now living in New York and a friend were returning from a Howard University homecoming weekend. During the trip, the two friends had attended a black gay men's rap session focusing on shade-consciousness within the race. On the return drive to Atlanta, they buzzed about the potential for similar organizing in their city. They hammered out the structure and logistics and Franklin rounded up other local activists like Archie Freeman, Kamau Ifoma and Bruce Wilkerson. "We had about nine people show up to that first meeting at my house," Franklin recalls. "The first topic was 'Does Your Mama Know.?' We were at different levels of comfort regarding our sexuality. We wanted a structure that supported honesty and free thought."

From its inception, Second Sunday had an informal style that promoted intimacy and spirituality. Monthly meetings were scheduled for the second Sunday, and rotated among members' homes. Potluck meals were established as a ritual. The spirits of the ancestors were invoked regularly. Word quickly spread throughout the community that something special was happening for black men - an entity created by and for brothers to provide safety for each other as same-sex attracted men. "It was time for black gay men to take care of their own," Franklin muses. "If we live in fear we cannot be strong. We wanted to foster new people to become leaders."

Solely by word of mouth, the group's popularity widened and its ranks expanded. Meeting formats became more varied, including panels, guest speakers, small group breakouts. Presentations were often very stylish. A session on black and white men relationships was held as a mock trial with legendary diva Duncan Teague as attorney for the defendant "Interracial Dating." A joint meeting with ZAMI, the black lesbian organization, was entitled "Everything You Always Wanted To Ask A Lesbian But Were Afraid You'd Get Beat Up!"

Meetings were still held in members' homes, with more than forty men cramming into living rooms, and standing and squatting on floors. Some of the old guard such as Franklin and Freeman had relocated and newer members were stepping up to the plate. A handful of them handled all the necessary tasks — mailing flyers, setting up potluck and facilitating meetings. A focus group meeting was held at Kalo's Coffeehouse to identify problems and devise solutions. Doug Jones, a writer currently residing in New York, was an active member during that period. "Second Sunday was a child then going through its terrible two's. It was a natural outgrowth of new people coming in, a lack of continuity between the new and the early members."

With over 120 members on its mailing list and an average attendance of 65 men per meeting, Second Sunday has grown tremendously. Its success may be at least partially attributed to its adherence to its original priorities and despite its expansion, there is still a level of intimacy. It still offers an environment that's safe, fun and supportive. The potluck is still a mainstay.

By-Laws were written and elections were held to usher in formal structure and accountability. The two Co-Chairmen are Ulester Douglas, a psychotherapist, and instructor with Men Stopping Violence and The Rainbow Project; and Craig Washington, an activist and African American Outreach

CONTINUED ON PAGE 13

SECOND SUNDAY,
CONTINUED FROM PAGE 11

Coordinator with AID Atlanta. Accountant Robert Simmons serves as the Treasurer and Kevin Madison, as Interim Secretary. A chain of several task committees, a steering committee and an executive committee performs the administrative duties.

With over 120 members on its mailing list and an average attendance of 65 men per meeting, Second Sunday has grown tremendously. It's success may be partially attributed to its adherence to its original priorities and despite its expansion, there is still a level of intimacy. It still offers an environment that is safe, fun and supportive. The potluck is still a mainstay. And there's no other space in town quite like it. Egypt Freeman explains, "[It's] something outside of the smoky bars and clubs where we look at each other in the dark. It's a way of meeting these people we see out and finding out who they are and what they're thinking." On a more personal note, Freeman adds, "I come to meet people and come out of my closet, not of sexuality, but my closet of personality. It makes it easier to talk to people." Co-Chairman Douglas adds , "Also, it is a place where we challenge the oppressive forces which nurture self-hate and distrust of each other. We build intimacy and a sense of community."

This year the group held several social functions to raise funds and promote more bonding outside of the meetings. The "Where The Boys Are - 1996 Picnic" was their first annual Labor Day fundraiser and drew favorable reviews from Atlantans and out-of-towners.

Second Sunday has made concerted efforts to address the AIDS epidemic in their community. They recently signed agreements with AIDS Education and Services for Minorities (AESM) and AID Atlanta's Umoja Project to host safer sex forums. An AIDS Walk team is being assembled and a panel discussion on Alternative AIDS Therapies is scheduled for November. The group also serves as a collaborator with an HIV-intervention program at Georgia State University targeting young black gay men.

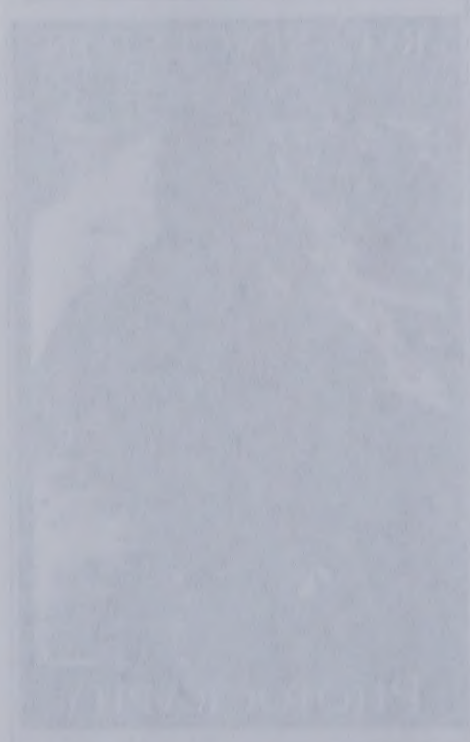
As the organization undergoes growth in rank and activities, it strives to serve its main purpose - its raison d'etre. Some members have expressed concern that the focus could become lost. Hopefully, Second Sunday will continue to do what it does very well and the brothers will continue to attend. One member offered simply, "I just come here for the love, that's all."

Venus™
WORKS!

Advertise Your Business Here!

"Our black gay books fly off the shelf!"
—Shawn
Owner, Truth Bookstore

(404) 755-8711
ADD THE POWER OF VENUS TO YOUR SALES TEAM.



SECOND SUNDAY

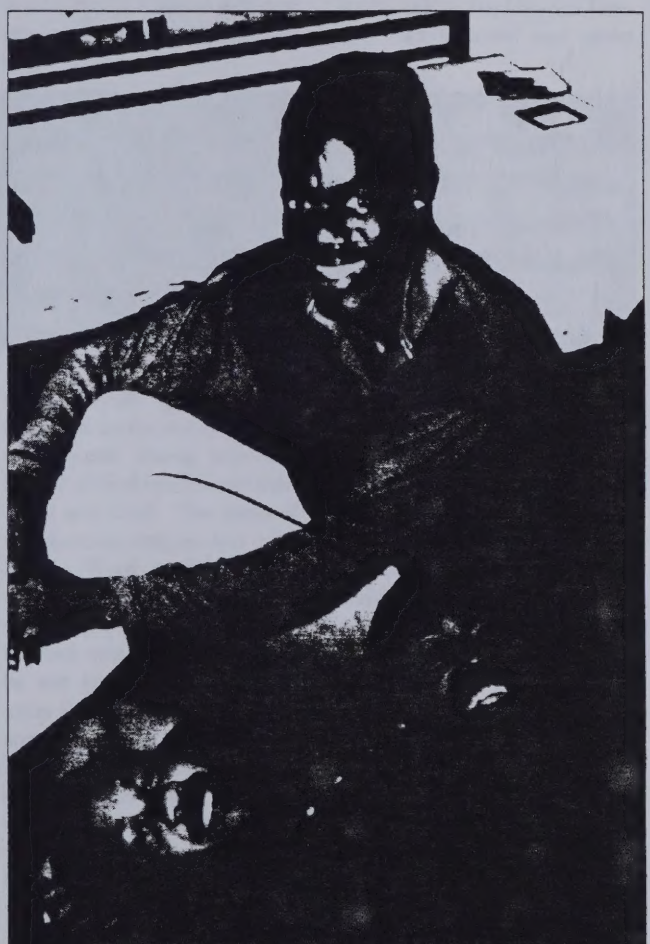
by Craig Washington

Second Sunday's mission statement defines the group as "a support organization created to assist the collective growth of gay, bisexual and transgendered men of African descent through educational, social, spiritual and cultural activities." They discuss scheduled topics that address a broad range of issues such as relationship maintenance, masculinity/femininity, ageism and others. As the name implies, the brothers congregate every second Sunday of each month. The regular meeting place was secured through an arrangement with Pastor S.F. Mahee of Unity Fellowship, Atlanta's only openly gay place of worship for the BG & L community.

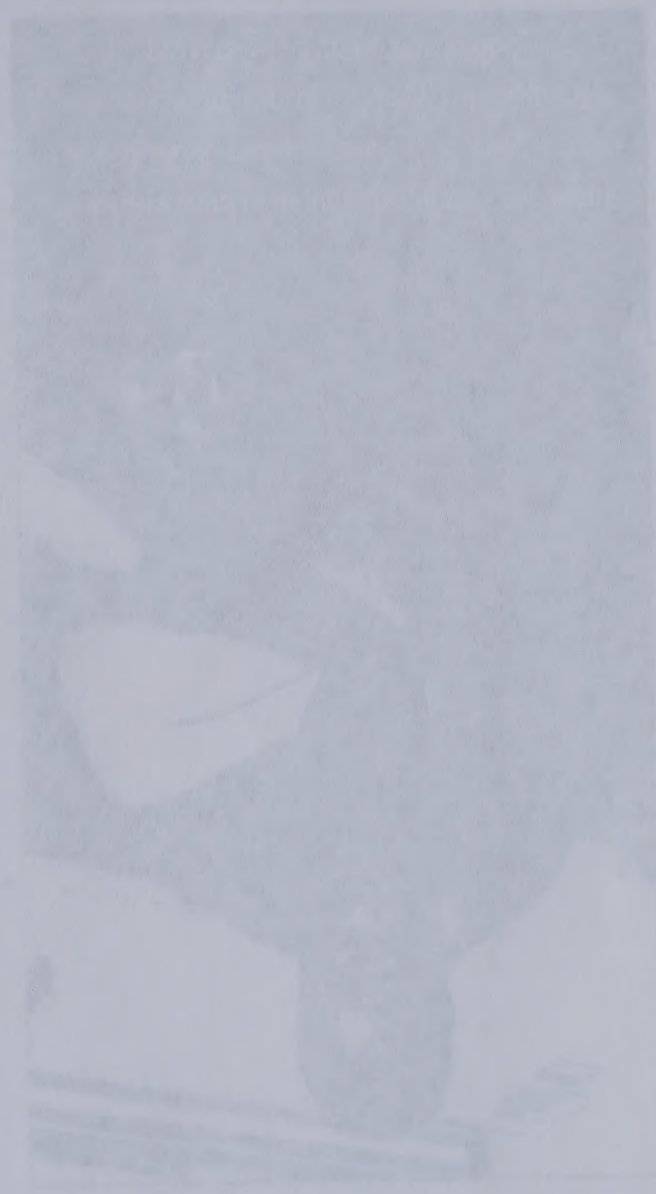
On the second Sunday in November the group will host writer, James Earl Hardy, author of "2nd Time Around". The December meeting will host Atlanta's local black gay theatre/readers group, Adodi Muse. All gay men of color are welcome. For directions and other information call 404-325-7321.

Meetings open with announcements highlighting group activities and community events. Discussion is led by a predesignated facilitator who encourages participation through

CONTINUED ON PAGE 11



"Solely by word of mouth, the group's popularity widened and its ranks expanded. Meeting formats became more varied, including panels, guest speakers, small group breakouts."



SECOND SUNDAY,
CONTINUED FROM PAGE 9

exploration of the topic. Attendants are urged to use "I" statements and to speak from personal experience. Because of the sensitivity of information shared (such as HIV disclosure) the group requests discretion and confidentiality. Non-judgmentalism is another golden rule usually obeyed. The meetings are often high-spirited as participants are passionate about their concerns. And of course, everyone has an opinion which makes for lively conversation. To the group's merit, the brothers agree to disagree with vehemence, not venom.

At the discussion's end, donations are solicited through a passing of the proverbial plate. Attendants then join hands and are led through a closing affirmation which varies from traditional Christian prayer to an Afrocentric appreciation of the Creator and our ancestors. Specific words of healing are offered after a particularly intense session. Afterward, the "congregation" breaks bread with potluck meals set up just outside the meeting space. Brothers then have an opportunity to relax, meet new faces and enjoy each other's energy.

It all started in November 1992 on a car ride back to Atlanta. Maurice Franklin, a well-known Atlanta activist now living in New York and a friend were returning from a Howard University homecoming weekend. During the trip, the two friends had attended a black gay men's rap session focusing on shade-consciousness within the race. On the return drive to Atlanta, they buzzed about the potential for similar organizing in their city. They hammered out the structure and logistics and Franklin rounded up other local activists like Archie Freeman, Kamau Ifoma and Bruce Wilkerson. "We had about nine people show up to that first meeting at my house," Franklin recalls. "The first topic was 'Does Your Mama Know.?' We were at different levels of comfort regarding our sexuality. We wanted a structure that supported honesty and free thought."

From its inception, Second Sunday had an informal style that promoted intimacy and spirituality. Monthly meetings were scheduled for the second Sunday, and rotated among members' homes. Potluck meals were established as a ritual. The spirits of the ancestors were invoked regularly. Word quickly spread throughout the community that something special was happening for black men - an entity created by and for brothers to provide safety for each other as same-sex attracted men. "It was time for black gay men to take care of their own," Franklin muses. "If we live in fear we cannot be strong. We wanted to foster new people to become leaders."

With over 120 members on its mailing list and an average attendance of 65 men per meeting, Second Sunday has grown tremendously. Its success may be at least partially attributed to its adherence to its original priorities and despite its expansion, there is still a level of intimacy. It still offers an environment that's safe, fun and supportive. The potluck is still a mainstay.

Solely by word of mouth, the group's popularity widened and its ranks expanded. Meeting formats became more varied, including panels, guest speakers, small group breakouts. Presentations were often very stylish. A session on black and white men relationships was held as a mock trial with legendary diva Duncan Teague as attorney for the defendant "Interracial Dating." A joint meeting with ZAMI, the black lesbian organization, was entitled "Everything You Always Wanted To Ask A Lesbian But Were Afraid You'd Get Beat Up!"

Meetings were still held in members' homes, with more than forty men cramming into living rooms, and standing and squatting on floors. Some of the old guard such as Franklin and Freeman had relocated and newer members were stepping up to the plate. A handful of them handled all the necessary tasks — mailing flyers, setting up potluck and facilitating meetings. A focus group meeting was held at Kalo's Coffeehouse to identify problems and devise solutions. Doug Jones, a writer currently residing in New York, was an active member during that period. "Second Sunday was a child then going through its terrible two's. It was a natural outgrowth of new people coming in, a lack of continuity between the new and the early members."

By-Laws were written and elections were held to usher in formal structure and accountability. The two Co-Chairmen are Ulester Douglas, a psychotherapist, and instructor with Men Stopping Violence and The Rainbow Project; and Craig Washington, an activist and African American Outreach

CONTINUED ON PAGE 13

SECOND SUNDAY,
CONTINUED FROM PAGE 11

Coordinator with AID Atlanta. Accountant Robert Simmons serves as the Treasurer and Kevin Madison, as Interim Secretary. A chain of several task committees, a steering committee and an executive committee performs the administrative duties.

With over 120 members on its mailing list and an average attendance of 65 men per meeting, Second Sunday has grown tremendously. It's success may be partially attributed to its adherence to its original priorities and despite its expansion, there is still a level of intimacy. It still offers an environment that is safe, fun and supportive. The potluck is still a mainstay. And there's no other space in town quite like it. Egypt Freeman explains, "[It's] something outside of the smoky bars and clubs where we look at each other in the dark. It's a way of meeting these people we see out and finding out who they are and what they're thinking." On a more personal note, Freeman adds, "I come to meet people and come out of my closet, not of sexuality, but my closet of personality. It makes it easier to talk to people." Co-Chairman Douglas adds , "Also, it is a place where we challenge the oppressive forces which nurture self-hate and distrust of each other. We build intimacy and a sense of community."

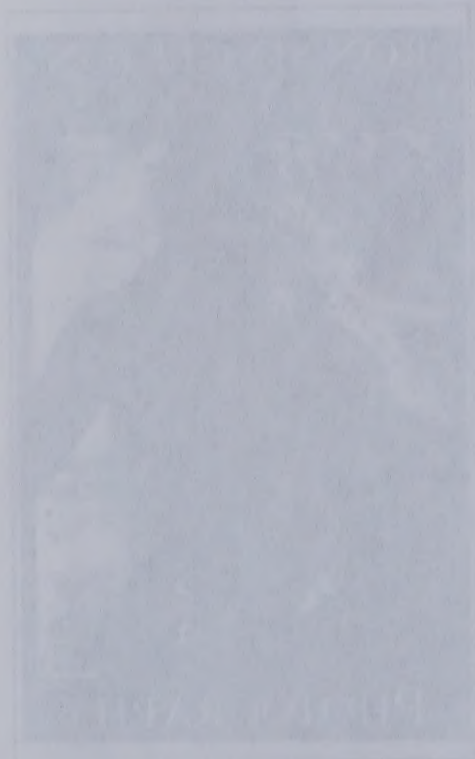
This year the group held several social functions to raise funds and promote more bonding outside of the meetings. The "Where The Boys Are - 1996 Picnic" was their first annual Labor Day fundraiser and drew favorable reviews from Atlantans and out-of-towners.

Second Sunday has made concerted efforts to address the AIDS epidemic in their community. They recently signed agreements with AIDS Education and Services for Minorities (AESM) and AID Atlanta's Umoja Project to host safer sex forums. An AIDS Walk team is being assembled and a panel discussion on Alternative AIDS Therapies is scheduled for November. The group also serves as a collaborator with an HIV-intervention program at Georgia State University targeting young black gay men.

As the organization undergoes growth in rank and activities, it strives to serve its main purpose - its raison d'etre. Some members have expressed concern that the focus could become lost. Hopefully, Second Sunday will continue to do what it does very well and the brothers will continue to attend. One member offered simply, "I just come here for the love, that's all."

Venus™
WORKS!

Advertise Your Business Here!

"Our black gay books fly off the shelf!"
—Shawn
Owner, Truth Bookstore


(404) 755-8711
ADD THE POWER OF VENUS TO YOUR SALES TEAM.